Addendum:

I've tried to write this essay engaging with both my Jewishness and my queerness. But I have to acknowledge that only one of these can be publicly proclaimed, from the U.S. president on down through prison staff and other residents here, as shameful, or demonic, or imaginary.

I'm a cis man and have not had to suffer transphobia directly -- that's something my friends and family face -- but physical and rhetorical violence toward trans people, and trans prisoners, is exponentially greater.

Antisemitism remains a potent force of malevolence in the world and in my prison dorm. But faith is a protected class, legally and socially, in a way that sexuality simply isn't.

At the moment, fascists are cynically deploying "fighting antisemitism" as a way to justify genocide and repression -- almost impressive in its level of intellectual bankruptcy, and insulting to Jews and Jewish ideals.

But for queers, and trans people, the people in power openly seek to dismantle our humanity as they debate our humanness, more akin to Jewishness in 1936 than 2026.

Neither hatred is excusable; nor are they equivalent. Acknowledging these two parts of myself fully also means acknowledging how they are attacked differently in the United States of the twenty-first century.

We're sitting on the bed, watching TV, when my grandmother explains to me that because my mother isn't Jewish, I'm not either, even though my father is.

But, she says, partial heritage is sufficient. "Good enough for Hitler," she says.

I am twelve.

Next to me, now, a casual white supremacist is watching TV here in prison. He's friendly, and in return I feel I have to be friendly toward him. The animated plot on screen is about going back in time to shoot the Fuhrer.

"I'm one of the few," he says over his shoulder, "who think he was right."

I'm not sure there are that few.

But I say nothing. I'm Jewish (enough) and queer, and trying to survive in prison. Sometimes doing nothing is survival, or at least it feels like it is. So I wear an attitude of acceptance, and don't reveal my true self.

It's not surprising that queer and trans prisoners tend to wear metaphorical masks. Some of us, for physical or emotional safety, have to use a mask of "normality," or at least plausible deniability, in order to survive. As for ancestry, anything not immediately visible as whiteness seems better left unsaid, at least to white people.

We're rarely able to show our full selves in here, even when we feel safe enough -- or simply incapable of hiding -- some parts.

The challenge is how to know when a mask is a shield, cumbersome but necessary, and when it is a prison in itself, limiting our growth and freedom. We shouldn't ever feel fully comfortable wearing the mask, or we risk a temporary strategy for just making do turning into the only way we know to live.

As Audre Lorde wrote:

"For we have been socialized to respect fear more than our own needs for language and definition, and while we wait in silence for that final luxury of fearlessness, the weight of that silence will choke us."

	1-10 yrs.	$100 and 2 mos.	$1000 or 5 yrs.	$1000 or 1 yr. or both

MASSACHUSETTS	20 yrs.	$30 or 1 yr.	$10	$300 or 5 yrs.

Wearing a mask doesn't mean you're giving up, it means you're surviving pending revolution. When you can, ask yourself whether your masks of silence or conformity are still necessary -- and yes, sometimes they are. But consider when and where your deepest vulnerabilities can, in love, power your greatest strength.

This system makes demands of you, demands to which you sometimes must acquiesce. Your love, however, contradicts the fictions of incarceration's hate and control.

Your very existence is good enough.

"The queens got very vocal, and some of them started to pick things up and throw them at the police. At one point a police car came down Christopher Street, and five or six queens leaped on it and started jumping up and down on the roof, and the roof just caved in. Later that night in my grandmother's apartment, she shakes me by the shoulders. We are watching one last show before I go to bed, and I'm feeling newly embarrassed in just a t-shirt and white little-kid briefs. I'm not even sure why I'm embarrassed; I'm ashamed for being ashamed.

"I want you to know," she shakes me. "I love you no matter what. No matter what," she says.

Nothing has prompted this. She just sees something in me, some truth I haven't yet figured out myself about my sexuality. She wants to get in before that truth hunts me down, to help me build the fortress that will withstand its march.

In a car a few months into the future, I'll hear her describe someone as Faygeleh, with an apparently good-natured laugh. It goes over my head.

I worry what will happen when those of us who are queer or trans move outside of prison, for those who get to leave.

Will we still be able to center ourselves in completeness? Or will we have integrated oppression so deeply in our bodies that we go on hiding a powerful, beautiful part of ourselves out in the wider world?

In prison it can feel like when you stand up, you stand alone. If I've learned anything from the people who struggled before me -- the Jewish survivors, the queer and trans fighters for dignity, the prison resisters inside and outside of the walls -- it's that the clearest path out of suffering isn't by soliciting love for yourself, comforting as that is to have. It's by learning self-love. My grandmother, with her flaws, showed me that.

For queer folks, one part of what we too often sacrifice is our most vulnerable aspect: our erotic selves. Lorde, again:

"The erotic is a measure between the beginnings of our sense of self and the chaos of our strongest feelings. It is an internal sense of satisfaction to which, once we have experienced it, we know we can aspire. For having experienced the fullness of this depth of feeling and recognizing its power, in honor and self-respect we can require no less of ourselves."

Love had allowed August to see through the lies of what was considered right, moral, or civilized. While his bodily survival still demanded partial silence, the survival of what mattered inside of himself demanded something as well.

Prisoners are forced to conceal the erotic parts of themselves -- queer prisoners doubly so.

I think it must be that of intimate power, that so institute these rules.

"GLBT leaders like to criticize young gays for movement seriously, but don't listen to them. that at Stonewall we were defending our right to meet each other, and to have sex."

There's a photograph from 1936, of a crowd of men saluting as a Nazi parade goes by -- except one man, alone among the group, who does not raise his arm.

As related by Isabel Wilkerson, the man in the picture is August Landmesser. He is "Aryan" but in love with a Jewish woman, illegal under the Third Reich's "racial infamy" laws. Those around him don't know this, of course -- to remove that mask of national purity would indeed put him in danger. But he is nonetheless willing to risk withholding public assent.

It's not too much of a stretch to say that August is "queering" the expectation of what makes for acceptable love. The unacceptable forms of love were forced, with violence, into hiding. Yet he chooses to show -- for reasons undisclosed -- that there are other ways to live.

August must acknowledge the murderous power holding him silent, while he can still refuse to consign his whole self to the shadows. His declining to salute keeps alive the parts inside of himself he cannot show.

I think about how many rallies August might have attended before, how many times he may have even raised his hand to the glint of an officer's pin.

Those other days he did nothing to stand against the tide -- and doing nothing matters, of course it does -- but one day love and courage welled up inside of him and anchored him firmly.

Under Hitler's Paragraph 175, thousands of LGBTQ+ people were stripped of their German citizenship and sent to death camps. (So, I would have qualified twice over.)

Berlin, a queer haven in the 1920s, was sanitized into conformity and then violently purged by the Third Reich. But when Allied Powers established a postwar government, Paragraph 175 was maintained.

Once, my grandmother takes me on a city bus, and she grumbles when some rambunctious Black teenagers board. At the beauty parlor, she kvetches about how loud "they always are," and I know she doesn't mean because of their age.

Yet her best friend at the apartment complex is Black; so is her granddaughter's husband. Her only great-grandchildren, a baby and a toddler, would have been "good enough for Hitler," too. I don't think about this until later.

We like to believe, I like to believe, that in the moment I would be the guy standing up to fascists in the streets.

Somehow when I was young and vulnerable, my grandmother thought I was strong enough to withstand the tide, or at least she was willing to give me that strength. (She had, after all, literally fought Nazis as an army nurse in WWII.)

And as it happens, I have had the privilege of confronting fascists in the streets -- our nation's recent development having re-energized the ideology.

Yet before this cartoon prison bully rooting for Hitler, I choose to do nothing, the nothing that hopes for bare survival. (I don't know, even now, if it's the antisemitism or the homophobia that intimidates me so effectively.) And in front of my grandmother's anti-Black racism, I said nothing.

If I couldn't question someone I love, could I really question someone I hate? I want to see everyone's human dignity -- or else I sink into fascistic ethics myself. Can I recognize the dignity in a hate-filled person if I can't call out the inhumane parts of a person who has given me so much love?

Love tells you that you are good enough, that you matter, no matter what -- but hate can tell you all of those things, too. We are courageously reckless in one moment and clinging to comfort and stability the next. Some heroes still commit atrocities,
